The mailing list included over 2,000 active names of instructors from around the country. Many of the early newsletters were formatted into articles, some of which can still be viewed online at www.speakingsolutions.com. | 200-2006

1D. RECOGNIZED IN U.S. NEWS & WORLD REPORT

Rae –Dupree, Janet, Let's Talk: Science & Technology, U.S. News & World Report, PP 58-59, May 12, 2003.

"I wrote the first draft of this story by talking at my computer. I thought it would be easy. After all, technical writer Karl Barksdale has composed the last 30 of his 43 books that way. "I got hooked after I went from 70 words per minute typing to 140 words per minute talking," says Barksdale, who also teaches eighth grade in Provo, Utah. These days, he says, better software and faster hardware means that most of those words come out right.

"Disabled people or those with repetitive motion injuries have embraced the technology. In fact, Barksdale first got interested in speech recognition when he bought IBM's ViaVoice dictation program for a student with cerebral palsy. Weeks later, he says, the boy was entering text at twice the speed of the school's fastest student typist. And a whole new generation of users is on the way. Last year, the National Business Education Association recommended that all students from fourth through 12 grade learn how to use both speech and handwriting recognition software (as well as learn to type). So far, hundreds of high schools and community colleges around the country have instituted programs.
